This guide is for people who want to become a public adjuster (PA) and want the real rules, not a sales pitch. It covers what the job is, how the money works, the licensing steps, and the license rules in ten big PA states: Florida, Texas, California, New York, Illinois, Georgia, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Colorado.

Every state fact comes from the state insurance department or the law itself, and the source is linked next to it. Where we couldn't confirm a detail, we say so instead of guessing. All links in this PDF are clickable.

KEY TAKEAWAYS

- Public adjusters work for the policyholder, not the insurer, and are usually paid a percentage of the claim. Florida and Texas cap that fee by law.
- All ten states covered here require a state exam for a resident public adjuster license.
- Required bonds range from $1,000 in New York to $50,000 in Florida, Illinois, and Louisiana.
- Florida and California require claims experience before a full license, and both have an apprentice route. Alabama doesn't license public adjusters at all.

NOT LEGAL ADVICE

This guide is general information only. It is not legal, licensing, or career advice. State rules, fees, and forms change; always confirm the current requirements with your state Department of Insurance (DOI) or equivalent before you pay for a course, exam, or bond.

PART 1

What a public adjuster does

A public adjuster (PA) is a licensed claims professional who works for the policyholder, not the insurance company. When a home or business has a fire, storm, water, or other property loss, the PA reads the policy, inspects and documents the damage, writes the estimate, puts the claim package together, and negotiates with the insurer's adjuster until the claim is paid.

Public adjuster
Hired by the policyholder. Works for the policyholder.

Staff (company) adjuster
The insurer's employee. Works for the carrier.

Independent adjuster
Hired by the insurer on contract. Works for the carrier.

As the Illinois Department of Insurance puts it, a PA "does not work for any insurance company" (Illinois DOI).

The work is part field, part desk: inspecting roofs and water-damaged rooms, building estimates (often in Xactimate), reading policy language, and following up with the carrier. Many roles also include bringing in new claims.

How public adjusters get paid

A PA signs a written contract with the policyholder. Most contracts pay the PA a percentage of what the insurer pays on the claim, so the PA earns more when the claim pays more. Some states also allow hourly or flat fees.

Many states cap the fee. Two examples, as of Oct 2026:

FLORIDA

10% / 20%

On residential claims: no more than 10% of claim payments for claims tied to a governor-declared state of emergency (for the year after the declaration), and no more than 20% on other claims. The fee can't be charged on the deductible, and a PA can't charge on money the insurer paid before the contract was signed (Fla. Stat. § 626.854).

TEXAS

10%

The total commission may not exceed 10% of the settlement, and a percentage fee isn't allowed when the insurer pays or commits to pay the policy limit within 72 hours of the loss being reported (Tex. Ins. Code § 4102.104).

If you work for a PA firm

If you work for a PA firm rather than for yourself, the firm usually holds the client contract and pays you. Common setups are a commission split on the claims you work or bring in, a base salary plus commission, or a 1099 contractor deal.

> Ask every employer how the split works, who pays for your bond and licenses, and when you get paid (often only after the insurer pays the claim).

The Open PA Jobs pay guide covers how PA compensation works.

PART 2

How to get licensed: the general path

Every state that licenses PAs sets its own rules, but the steps look similar almost everywhere.

1. Pick your home state. Your first (resident) license comes from the state you live in.
2. Meet any experience rule. Florida and California require claims experience first, and both offer an apprentice route.
3. Take a pre-licensing course if required. California, New York, and Georgia require one. Others don't list one.
4. Pass the state public adjuster exam, given by vendors such as PSI or Pearson VUE.
5. Get fingerprinted for a criminal background check.
6. Buy a surety bond (or, in some states, a letter of credit). Amounts range from $1,000 in New York to $50,000 in Florida, Illinois, and Louisiana.
7. Apply and pay the fee, usually online through NIPR or Sircon.
8. Get your client contract approved where the state requires it. Illinois, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and Texas all have contract rules.
9. Add nonresident licenses for other states. Many waive the exam if you hold a current home-state PA license.
10. Keep up with continuing education (CE) and renewals, usually every two years.

> Many candidates start as an apprentice, trainee, or estimator at a PA firm. Some firms help pay for the course, exam, and bond.

STATE NOTE

AL

Alabama and states that don't license PAs

⚠ ALABAMA

Alabama does not license or recognize public adjusters (Alabama DOI FAQ). The department's glossary adds that in Alabama, people who represent policyholders on claims must be attorneys (Alabama DOI).

Other states

A few other states have no PA license or restrict the work. We haven't confirmed each against an official source, so we don't list them; check with your state's insurance department.

If your state doesn't license PAs

You may be able to designate another state as your home state. California allows this if you finish its pre-licensing course and pass its exam (Ins. Code § 15009.1).

Verified as of Oct 2026. Confirm with the department before you pay for anything.

PART 5

How to land your first PA job

Most PAs start inside a firm, and in Florida and California that time can count toward the full license. What tends to work:

Look at apprentice and trainee listings first. Firms post these for people who are licensed or getting licensed. Search the job board for “apprentice” or “trainee,” and read the role types page to see how desk, field, and sales roles differ.

Apply where the work is. Florida and Texas have the most PA firms and the most storm claims. Browse Florida jobs, Texas jobs, or every state.

Consider remote desk roles. Estimating, file review, and claims support can often be done from home. See remote public adjuster jobs.

Lead with useful skills. Xactimate, construction or roofing, restoration, and claims or sales experience all help.

Ask the money questions early. What is the split, is there a base or draw, who pays for licenses and the bond, and what happens to open claims if you leave?

Avoid red flags. Walk away from anyone who guarantees income, charges you to “join,” or wants you working claims before you are licensed or appointed.

Get alerts. Sign up for job alerts or check the Open PA Jobs homepage.

PART 6 · COMMON QUESTIONS

FAQ

Q Do I need a license to work as a public adjuster?

In most states, yes. Every state covered in this guide requires a public adjuster license before you can contract with policyholders, and each requires an exam for a resident license. Alabama is an exception: it does not license or recognize public adjusters at all.

Q How long does it take to become a public adjuster?

It depends on the state. In states like Texas, Illinois, and Colorado, the main steps are the exam, fingerprints, bond, and application. Florida first requires 6 continuous months as an appointed apprentice or company or independent adjuster, and California requires two years of claims experience or 12 months as a licensed apprentice.

Q How do public adjusters get paid?

Usually a percentage of what the insurer pays on the claim, set in a written contract with the policyholder. Many states cap that fee. Texas caps it at 10% of the settlement, and Florida caps residential claims at 10% for state-of-emergency claims in the year after the declaration and 20% otherwise. Adjusters who work for a firm are usually paid through a commission split, salary plus commission, or a 1099 arrangement.

Q Can I work as a public adjuster in more than one state?

Yes. You hold a resident license in your home state and add nonresident licenses in other states. Many states, including Texas and Pennsylvania, waive the exam for nonresidents who hold a current PA license in a home state with similar rules. Each state still requires its own application, fees, and usually its own bond.

Q What is the difference between a public adjuster and an independent adjuster?

A public adjuster is hired by the policyholder and works for them. An independent adjuster is hired by the insurance company on a contract basis and works for the insurer. Both handle property claims, but they sit on opposite sides of the claim.
